

Stuti Khemani, a Senior Economist at the World Bank's Development Research Group, specializes in the political economy of public policy and institutional reforms for development. With a PhD from MIT, her research has been featured in top journals like American Economic Journal and American Political Science Review. She authored the Policy Research Report Making Politics Work for Development and focuses on designing governance interventions to strengthen state capacity. Her work spans countries such as India, Nigeria, and Tanzania.